The Second Child

How your childhood parents your children — and what the work of interrupting it looks like.

There are two children in your house. One of them you can see — you know their shoe size, their cry, their favourite cereal. The other one is you, at seven, still waiting in a kitchen that no longer exists for a sentence nobody said.

Every parent raises both children at once. Most can't tell which one is crying.

The Second Child is the companion to The Parenting Deck — and a book that stands on its own. Written by trauma and hypnotherapy practitioner Hakeem Lesolang, it answers all 52 of the deck's questions through the four engines that drive every inherited pattern: reenactment, overcorrection, the child as audience, and provision as love. The banned sentence that surfaces when you're tired. The gifts addressed to a child who isn't in the room. The rules protecting a door that closed thirty years ago. Each question gets its mechanics — how the pattern was installed, how it runs — and one practical interruption you can use this week, in a real kitchen, on a real Tuesday.

This is not a book about becoming a perfect parent. That parent doesn't exist and never has. It's about becoming an interrupting one — because the difference between the homes that build people and the homes that build patients was never the absence of wounds. It's whether the wounds are still doing the parenting.

You were somebody's child before you were anybody's parent. Start there.
